For Patricia Nora, 1994

by Mary Cooper Martinez

I was glad when I felt your bird-like heart beating under my cold palm That early morning six years ago

I was glad when you bellowed your first cry of yourself, when I heard you mark the world with your voice print

I was glad when
 the obstetrician, head bent between my open legs, said,
 I can see a shock of thick, black hair and when every day I see you burst through the open school doors that hair gleaming in the sunlight red velvet bow aslew, bangs in your eyes

I was glad when
 you said lastnight (as I leaned over to kiss you),

 "I want this shirt you're wearing, when you're finished with it, Mommy."

 (and I thought,
 Yes, because it's old and worn and the fabric feels sweet on the skin) and you said,

 "Because it smells like you, and you crushed it to your face and breathed me in,

 cooing like a tiny dove.
